Difference Between BIS & BES

If no one has ever had a talk about the BlackBerry Internet Service and the BlackBerry Enterprise Server with you, a critical lack of understanding in regards to basic BlackBerry operation may abound. This can be especially true if you use a company-issued BlackBerry and find yourself wondering why friends can operate their BlackBerrys in ways that you can't. Understanding the difference between the BIS and the BES can clarify the confusion. Both services allow your device to access the Internet to browse the Web and send email; the difference lies in how they accomplish this.

Knowing the BIS

The BlackBerry Internet Service is operated by your carrier and allows you to access the Internet with your device. Unless you're using a company-issued BlackBerry, your phone likely uses this service. Your data traffic travels through this centralized server before entering the Web at large. While this service does encrypt your data, the protection isn't as extensive as that offered by the BES. It's possible for your data to be intercepted and decrypted for malicious purposes. Although this opens you up to some degree of risk, the BIS also allows you to have the most control over your phone. You get to choose which applications you want to use and how to customize your device's security settings.

The BES Method

Unlike the BIS, BlackBerry Enterprise Servers are administrated by businesses. If your BlackBerry has been issued to you by your company, it likely operates over the BES. This service still allows your BlackBerry to access the Web but it may curtail your activity in the process. Since all data traffic flows through the BES before entering or exiting the Web, the owning corporation can completely control what is and isn't accessible. For instance, social networking sites like Google+ and Facebook may be restricted due to the potential security risks they can pose. While you may find this frustrating, the lockdowns are meant to protect sensitive company data.

Security Settings

If your BlackBerry operates over a BIS, you can choose whether or not your BlackBerry requires a password before use. With a BES, this is often a standard setting that isn't alterable. Whereas the BIS is controlled by your carrier and thus allows access to most websites and applications, the BES is often customized to restrict a variety of sites and allow applications to be installed only by company technicians. The entire settings menu may even be locked down to prevent you from changing settings that could negatively impact your BlackBerry's communication with the network.

BES Buzzkill

If your BlackBerry operates via the BES while a friend's works over the BIS, you may feel frustrated that your experience is vastly curtailed in comparison. If you purchased your BlackBerry on your own and elected to use it with the BES, you can always change your mind and have it reverted to the BIS. While you'll most likely lose access to corporate email and company specific apps, you may not need them if your work computer is always nearby. If your phone is provided to you by the company, however, you may wish to buy your own BlackBerry for personal use.
